

A NOISY MIND

(constant ringing)

Every thought contains an interruption that presents itself as more urgent, more interesting, than the one it impedes upon yet it dissolves into the ether of your mind just as quickly as its predecessor. There is only the anxious void brought on by the feeling that you once knew what you were supposed to be doing in that moment but have now forgotten.

(the ringing is the loudest when you first wake)

Silence in its true form no longer exists. A quiet room is something to dread. The cacophony of a bustling city or loud guitar music provides the audiological camouflage for your nervous system to forget its eternal high-pitched companion, but even these defensive decibels do their own damage. Ultimately the increasing intensity of the ring wins out and there is nowhere left to escape except the brown red noise of the hissing shower or the soft chalky blue of a xanax tablet.

(TV and a fan can be helpful at night)

The ringing is a constant reminder of a past life when home was mostly a state of mind. You rarely woke up in your own bed. Hotel after hotel, van after van, bus after bus, plane after plane. For most months, year after year, music so loud it shook your internal organs on stage and so powerful it forced tears out of your eyes when certain moments of songs would arrive. There was probably some ringing then too but you were rarely ever still enough to notice. Now you are still and everything else seems a blur.

(a constant companion, always with you)

A stack of half completed to-do lists clutters multiple surfaces of each room. Many to-dos have been sacrificed to the swirl of faulty memory and scattered prioritization. You can't even commit to the act of crossing off the tasks you have done and so now there is a new task added : "cross off completed tasks on to-do list" which does not get done. Laundry and dishes pile up. You forgot to take out the trash. You spend an hour trying to trick the AI answering services to let you talk to a human to pay your late bill that you thought was set to autopay. Actually, nevermind, your account is now overdrawn. 143 unread messages. A reminder alarm goes off repeatedly but you can't recall what it was for. It says "wake up for xmas" but it's 4:44pm in October. Your phone's cracked screen that you taped back together cuts your fingers as you touch the screen. As you try to download your bank's mobile app, you see that your device is out of space. You remember that your phone bill is also late. Your service is now suspended. Your car is almost out of gas and on its last legs. The grass is tall. Your hair is long. A month just went by as you blinked. You're hungry but too tired to go to the store. You contemplate getting back on medication but can't remember the name of your doctor. Damn, it's after business hours anyway. Maybe that was what the alarm was for. At least you forgot about the ringing for a moment. Oh wait, there it is again.
